way. At the same time the position of the foreign schoolmaster was completely changed by his direct participation in activities which contributed to the comfort and success of native life. The momentum of the educational organization that was started in the early days when physical education and work were put on a footing of equal recognition with arithmetic and reading can be seen in these reports. Agricultural education and advanced practical education of other sorts have gone forward in the Philippine Islands with the most encouraging success. The present report<sup>1</sup> shows by way of illustrations, as well as by way of tabular accounts, the success of this school system accomplished under the conditions that have been sketched above.
